THE RARE EARTH EDIT

Warmth, depth, and mineral color — grounded in ochre, clay, shadow, and fired neutrals.

Pareo

RARE EARTH

The kind of piece that does more than it lets on— wrap it, knot it, wear it three ways before lunch. Tied at the hip, draped over the shoulder, cinched at the waist like you planned it that way. It moves from sand to lunch to golden hour without a costume change, which is the whole point.

RAISED + YOGA

RARE EARTH

Texture you can see before you even unfold it. This raised terry towel is equal parts art and function, and it knows it. The dimensional weave gives it real presence in the hand— stack two and the texture does the talking. It's the towel that gets a compliment before it's even done its job.

Turkish Towel

RARE EARTH

Deceptively lightweight, surprisingly versatile. The flat-woven Turkish towel has been doing the most since before it was fashionable—sarong, scarf, picnic blanket, sun shield, all in one square of cotton that packs down to nothing. It dries quickly, packs in seconds, and never once looks like it’s trying.

Plush

RARE EARTH

Deeply soft, seriously absorbent — the kind of towel that makes the beach feel considered. This is the one you reach for when you want the lounge chair to feel like a suite. Heavier hand, denser pile, the kind of weight that says it’s not going anywhere when the wind picks up.

THE MUST HAVES,

The Essentials

THE ESSENTIALS

Cotton-linen blend that softens with age, like all the best things. A quiet upgrade to the everyday ritual of drying off — less terrycloth, more textile. This is the category for the person who notices the difference between a towel that's merely functional and one that feels like part of the room.
